"Many factors can adversely affect sexual performance. Issues such as physical disability, illness, obesity, medications, aging, stress, grief, emotional distress and relationship conflicts serve as contributing factors to sexual distress. I believe strongly in the connection of sexual wellness and good health. I practice psychotherapy and psychopharmacology as they relate to human sexuality, depression, anxiety disorders, co-dependency, marital relationship, conflicts, divorce and separation, transition, post traumatic stress syndrome, stress management and life style modification. I believe both pre and post-op sexual education and counseling are essential to the healing process as it allows patients and their families the ability to plan for, address possible potential problems and have realistic expectations. Strategies of therapy are very patient specific and must include variations of therapy, education, medications, and aids for the patient and their partner. Patients feel confident when their specialists work together. They feel valued when they receive compassion and support. Well informed patients contribute greatly to improved outcomes and overall satisfaction. Satisfied patients and family member become great advocates."
